The granulometry and the particle-size distribution of five pectic polysaccharides (CMP, CMPIII, CMPIII-III, P-I and P-II) isolated from horseradish root (Armoracées) were determined by a continuous (DLS 90 Plus with dynamic light scattering) and a cascade (AUC) light-scattering technique coupled with size-exclusion chromatography. The aggregation of these polysaccharides followed a power law with an exponent of around 0.50. The fractal dimension and the monomeric mass concentration increased as a function of the sample concentration. The maximum mass concentration was found close to the gel point for all pectins. The relative amounts of the larger clusters appeared to correlate well with their elution volume in the SEC. The electrophoretic separation of these pectins on non-denaturing polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis revealed the presence of a few large linear fragments (around 200-1500 kDa), some smaller fragments (15-20 kDa) and the monomeric units (90 kDa), which were grouped by distance in a polymer fingerprint pattern. These findings suggest a relatively homogeneous heterogeneous composition of the pectins studied.[Retrospective analysis of myocardial ischemia after percutaneous transluminal coronary angioplasty].
