Women with abnormal cervical cytology are frequently referred for colposcopy after triaging with a primary cytology specimen. We hypothesized that women with abnormal primary cytology would be referred for colposcopy with a greater proportion of unsatisfactory specimens. A retrospective analysis of all colposcopies performed by a single colposcopist was conducted. All biopsy-proven high-grade squamous intraepithelial lesion or worse cases were included. Women with only a follow-up referral visit underwent cytologic testing with a primary specimen. Among 953 women referred for colposcopy after triaging with a primary specimen, 231 (24%) had a follow-up visit. The most common reason for referral was referral from a primary cytology with an unsatisfactory specimen (39% of follow-up visits). Among women with a follow-up visit, 51 (70%) and 23 (31%) had repeat testing using either a primary or follow-up specimen, respectively. Of these women, 39 (74%) and 18 (35%) had a repeat biopsy using a primary and follow-up specimen, respectively. Rates of repeat biopsy using a primary specimen were similar for women with and without abnormal follow-up testing. The highest rates of repeat biopsy were obtained among women with repeat testing (primary specimen) with or without abnormal follow-up testing. Repeat testing following abnormal primary and follow-up testing was
