Football (also known as soccer or soccer) is a team sport played between two teams of eleven players. There are two main types of soccer: Association Football and American football. In association football, the team members of each side have separate roles in order to score goals or prevent the opposition from doing so. A goalkeeper keeps the ball away from the goal using either a hands or hands and feet and is assisted by a defence, consisting of up to five outfield defenders. The remaining outfield players, or midfielders, attempt to cause confusion amongst the opposition while the forwards try to score. The main role is to attack or defend, depending on the side. If a team scores a goal, the opposing team then have time to retrieve the ball and score. If the team does not score, then the team with the most goals at the end of 90 minutes wins. The most successful type of scoring, known as the "golden goal", is when the goalkeeper or a defender in the other team's goal throws the ball into the goal from the halfway line. In American football, the offensive team is known as the "home" team, and the defensive team is known as the "away" team. Each team has a line of 11 players, numbered 1 to 11, though not all positions are used equally often. The head coach then sends in the players as they wish, but ultimately, the head coach calls each play. The specific roles are the quarterback and the various receivers, tackles, and running backs. The quarterback of the offense is similar to the goalkeeper of football and calls the plays using the ball in his hand, with receivers (known as offensive players) catching passes from the quarterback and running to try to score. The quarterback is assisted by the offensive line (7 men) and, in the more modern versions of the game, by the running backs, receivers, and tight ends. Offensive players try to gain yards by running, otherwise known as "carries", or passing the ball to receivers or to the quarterback for a run. An individual win is achieved when the offensive team acquires more points than the defensive team.
