The result is a game that is a true football experience on and off the pitch with more authentic movements and reactions on both sides of the ball. FIFA licensed player movements – enhanced In FIFA 20, EA did a great job at integrating player likeness (body, skin and hair) and animations, but the actual player movements were not as smooth and fluid as you would expect. Last year’s technical designer head of technology Dr Joe Belfiore revealed a hard truth to the community: “The engine is okay for most things, but it doesn’t use a lot of data that was collected on the players”. With Cracked Fifa 22 With Keygen, EA has addressed this issue by collecting more data from athletes and validating that data to make sure the movements are realistic. “We have been asking more about movements,” Dr Belfiore shared. “What the player is doing in a real match. Not just in a match editor, but in a real match. We brought them into the lab at EA and we showed them a couple of training matches and then they watched the matches. We also had the player wear a motion capture suit on a day in the life, so we can see what they’re doing during a match. Not just where they are standing, but how they stand, what their posture is. So what’s optimal?” It’s clear the developers are listening to the feedback and hard data from real world games. “It was the opposite for FIFA 10 where we were using too much data,” Dr Belfiore continued, “but now we’re using way less than 10 years ago. We collected way more data during this year than we did 10 years ago. We collected in person twice a year. One year off, so that was 12+ months.” Easier to train the engine? Some were worried the data collection would slow down the creation of the game in any way, as the staff have to manually go through all the collected data – and it’s a lot of data. “We went through in person twice a year, so we had a lot of time to evaluate the data,” Dr Belfiore added. “When you look at the player biomechanics, how players move, how the player suits move during a match – we have data on how the player is moving,
