This visit was an "informal social gathering". The "informal social gathering", as the Daily Mail calls it, was a fundraiser for the President's re-election campaign. Obama's visit was partly to raise funds and partly to meet some (his) "friends". We are not told the reasons for the President's visit. We are not told if the President met any friends of his and while we are not told the names of any of the people he met, we are not told if any of these people knew about the President's visit. Perhaps some did, but we are not told. The main story in the Daily Mail read: "Having become the first president to campaign on a college campus in 2012, Barack Obama is now trying to outflank Republican rivals by making his mark on the world of higher education. "The president is on a summer break, but his 12th-month agenda is delivering an education agenda to campuses across the U.S." The story is untrue, as is its thrust. The President is not campaigning on college campuses. If Obama was campaigning, why did the Daily Mail write: "Having become the first president to campaign on a college campus in 2012"? The 2012 campaign was over five years ago. The thrust of the Daily Mail story is wrong. If Obama was going to campaign on a college campus, he has already done that. The 2012 campaign was over five years ago. And he has a long list of college visits. Yes, he is working on the college visits list. The President who plans college visits is not campaigning on college campuses. What is the President trying to achieve by visiting college campuses?
