In the container field, a long-standing problem has been the formation of containers using a hand-held, manually applied applicator. This problem arises out of the cost and complexity of the equipment needed, as well as the time required to operate the equipment. Moreover, this problem also includes the fact that most of the prior art equipment used in the container art are not configured to be generally useful for forming a package or container of any kind, let alone a vial for the filling of a medical product such as a parenteral fluid.
